“Mexican Immigrants and Public Resources: Costs and Contributions”

(co-authors: Douglas S. Massey, Princeton University, and Brandon Wagner, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill)

Abstract: A major shortcoming of most prior research on immigrant’s use of social services and tax payments is the inability to disaggregate findings by legal status. Federal data from the Census and Current Population Survey only distinguish between citizens and other foreigners, and few data sets contain information sufficient to identify undocumented migrants with any reliability. The one exception is the Mexican Migration Project, which has compiled information on contributions of, and services used by, Mexican migrants in all legal statuses for more than two decades. In this presentation, we use these data to understand the shifts and patterns of service use and contributions reported by the largest immigrant population in the United States. Our findings are noteworthy in two ways. First, they reveal that legally authorized migrants are more likely than their unauthorized counterparts to rely on social and health services. Second, among recent arrivals, whereas authorized immigrants are more likely to make contributions, the unauthorized are less likely to use services, compared to their counterparts entering before 1986. We argue these findings reflect the restrictive immigration policy context that began after 1986 and has since intensified, whereby immigrants increasingly fear deportation and avoid federal and local government officials.

"China's More Than 50 Million Extra Boys: What are Some of their Societal and Demographic Implications"

Abstract: China has had an unbalanced sex ratio at birth (SRB) since the mid-1980s. For the past several years China's SRB has been 120 (120 boys born each year per 100 girls born). Accordingly, there have already been born in China around 44 million boys who when they reach marriage age will not be able to find Chinese women to marry. This number will reach 51 million by the year 2020 only if China is able to drop its current SRB of 120 down to 109; if the SRB remains at 120, there will be around 55 million extra boys in the year 2020. This is a really big number, one-sixth the size of the total US population and more than twice the size of the population of Texas, an astoundingly large number of extra men who won't be able to find Chinese women to marry. What are some of the demographic and societal implications of the largest number of unmarried men in a single country in recorded human history?
